CHAPTER III.

Copartners for the Public Good.

THE Daily Clarion was becoming the most widely talked of newspaper in the state. Brand and Cole improved the paper vastly, using half tone cuts and engaging special writers. They planned an elaborate expose of Sacc-Ozone and Multikuroi, and the day the first article of the campaign appeared Boyd sternly demanded of Duncan how his arrangement with Editor Cole had been violated.

"Why," the patent medicine king shouted excitedly, "this attack is ten times worse than the first one! It says that my factory, where Sacc-Ozone is made, by its unhealthy conditions breeds the very diseases that the medicine is claimed to cure and that Sacc-Ozone does not cure it at all. Think of that cursed statement! It says that I buy more opium than any one else in America. It tells about that fool Doyle that you discharged, and there is an affidavit signed by him that says our employees have to drink whisky during working hours because the bad air tires them. He swears that there isn't a ventilator in the building. There are two. They are in my private office."

"I'll fix that Cole!" snarled Duncan. "I'll destroy him or else he will destroy us."

"Come with me," said Boyd. "We will go over to the Clarion office now." And they did so.

Their reception was not altogether cordial.

Cole was at his desk when the irate couple arrived. They went right in past the office boy without deigning to send in their cards.

"You cheap faker!" cried Duncan. "You'll suffer for this!"

Boyd stood at one side, and his strong face wore a grim, determined smile.

Cole looked up from his work.

"How can I suffer when I don't own the paper?"

Boyd and Duncan exchanged a surprised glance.

Duncan went on:

"You don't? How's that?"

"I've sold out."

"Who to?"

"The office boy."

Brand, who was standing outside the managing editor's door, doubled up in merriment.

Boyd stiffened and flushed in his anger at the answer.

Duncan, by his side, glowered at Cole and retorted:

"Huh. Smart. Smart. We're here at your party, Mr. Smart, and you'll live to wish that you had never started on this line of yellow journal vandalism. Who owns this miserable rag?"

He waved a copy of the day's Clarion in the editor's face.

Cole did not budge an inch. He turned his face away from Duncan and resumed writing an editorial for the next day's paper.

Brand and the Clarion had combined their fight on Boyd with a spirited campaign to prevent tuberculosis, and they were receiving most valuable co-operation from the Everytown Anti-tuberculosis society. As a coincidence, when Boyd and Duncan called, the editorial he was writing was one commending the society for its work. It had conducted a hearing before the mayor and recommended that the city establish a tuberculosis sanatorium.

The men swung away to the door, and Brand dodged into an adjoining office.

The editor turned and called after his visitors:

"I can't tell you who owns the Clarion because I don't know my office boy's last name. I think his first name is Willie."

The pair snorted in their contempt for Cole and his wit and stormed into the elevator vowing vengeance on their foe.

"It's a case of the devil take the hindmost," grunted Duncan. "and we must keep well to the fore. I'll put a detective on the job, and we'll soon find out whether Cole has sold his paper or not, and to whom he sold it, if it really has left his possession."

Boyd nodded approvingly.

"We have the brains and the money and pull to beat him in this matter. We conservative business men and the others like us in Everytown cannot afford to have an independent newspaper here. Next thing we know the Clarion will be attacking the railroads, the insurance companies and even our board of councilmen and our mayor."

The men separated.

"Do what you think best," was Boyd's parting advice.

"I'll take a chance on something desperate if I have to," replied the brutal Duncan. "I have an idea that the days of the Clarion are numbered."

The factory manager soon had Mooney of the Continental Detective showed signs of worry and care. At the same time Duncan and the detective were closeted with Boyd. While Brand was telling Eleanor of his campaign with the Anti-tuberculosis society to wipe out the dread disease and the bad laboring and housing conditions, she was very enthusiastic and commended him upon his great purpose. They were trying to get the mayor to aid them, he told her. That official had, in fact, at a public hearing already promised to favor the building of a sanatorium.

Eleanor became so enthusiastic that she determined that her father must bear the story, but Brand knew what such a happening would mean. He discouraged her, but the girl believed her father would be interested and hurried to the library, where Boyd was closeted with his hitherto. She begged him to listen to Matthew.

Boyd nearly exploded with rage when he heard of Brand's presence in his home; but, controlling himself, he finally took Duncan along to hear the story.

But the sight of Brand was too much for Emmerson Boyd, who had never been noted for what is generally known as a mild temper.

"Get out of my house!" he roughly cried, walking swiftly toward him. "You are a liar, a blackmailer and a cur! You can't make any truce with me! It's war to the knife! Go!"

Brand slowly retreated and departed, with Eleanor gazing fondly after him.

"Yes, it's war to the knife," said Duncan slowly and significantly to the desperate medicine king.
